

Course Report AG2110 2025

40 students were registered for the course. At the time of writing the course report, when the student evaluations were sent, 35 students had passed the course (23 with VG and 12 with G).

Substantial changes were made to the course this year given feedback from students the following year. Johan Stennek did not continue on the course due to budget cuts and because students in past years felt that this portion of the course was less engaging and not clearly related to global governance. In addition, the first seminar was changed to cover the application of the Stone text on global policy making to the Sustainable Development Goals. Furthermore, I paid more attention to spacing out the paper writing work and presentation/discussion work for the seminars based on criticism from last year's evaluation.

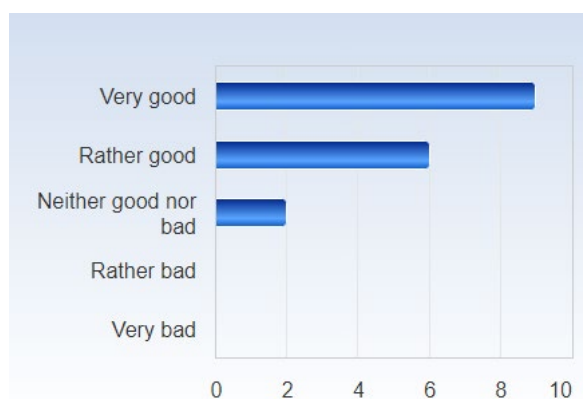

17 students responded to the evaluation, approx. 42% of those who took the course. In this case, one could argue that the results are potentially not representative of the universe of students that took the course. All aspects of the course were rated rather good or very good by the majority of students. Thus, overall, the course was rated favorably by the students.

In the student comments, there were some critical comments to consider for improvements next year. On the lectures, there were a couple of suggestions to add more, cover less topics with more depth, and to make the information on the slides more engaging. There was also a suggestion to revise the final assignment, the take-home exam, into an individual take-home assignment with more time to complete and more independent research required. In addition, there were suggestions to improve the course structure by listing required literature under modules on canvas, more clearly explaining assignments and decreasing the student-led portions of the course. I will take these comments into consideration in thinking of ways to improve the course for next year.

Below is a summary of how the course was rated based on responses to each of the questions on the course.
