Course name, course code, programme and semester European Environment and Energy EU2210, HT23	Course instructors's name och e-mail Niklas Harring, niklas.harring@pol.gu.se
Throughput and achievement	We had 21 registered students, with 20 students actively following the course. Of these, 15 have a final grade, of these, eight have VG and seven have G.
Impressions of course execution: general and specific	EU2210 is a generally well-functioning course; however, there is an increase in negative feedback from students this year. I believe it is imperative for the teachers to convene a meeting to address these concerns and also discuss how to effectively manage the challenges posed by students utilizing AI for their assignments.
Impressions of the students' general views on the course	According to the written evaluation (from 9 respondents), one student deems it "very good," while three find it "rather good." Additionally, one student considers it "neither good nor bad," two express that it is "rather bad," and two label it as "very bad." Overall, the course evaluation is more critical than in previous years. Interestingly, during an oral evaluation, students displayed a more positive sentiment. However, in the written feedback, students mention concerns such as "too little engagement with the course theme" and write that "the content of the course was good. The organization – was not." One noteworthy factor influencing the overall impression is that some students perceived a delay in grading one of the assignments, although grades were, in fact, reported on time. Nevertheless, this led to dissatisfaction among some students.
Impressions of the students' specific views on the course	One significant concern from the students' standpoint is the insufficient number of student-teacher interactions, including both lectures and seminars. Moreover, there is dissatisfaction with the perceived lack of alignment between the lectures and the corresponding assignments.
Ideas about potential changes for the next time the course is given	The primary recommendation would naturally be allocating more teaching hours to the course, thereby enhancing the opportunities for teacher-student interactions. If increasing teaching hours is unfeasible, an alternative suggestion is to streamline the number of lecturers. Currently, there are three main teachers, each responsible for a specific theme, and three additional lecturers, each contributing only one lecture. Combining these three lectures under the purview of the "main teachers" could foster a more cohesive course experience. Regardless of the approach taken, it is crucial for the "main teachers" to convene a meeting before the next time the course is given. This meeting should focus on refining how assignments are introduced and ensuring alignment between lectures and assignments. Additionally, discussions should address the timeline for providing feedback on assignments, allowing students to incorporate comments into their subsequent work.

	Moreover, the issue of students attending lectures from the course "Europe in the World" should be examined. This practice may have caused confusion among some students, necessitating a conversation about the added value of these joint lectures.
Ideas for long-term and / or more extensive changes	We were concerned that AI might complicate the assessment of students' assignments. However, I don't believe this was an issue this year. Nevertheless, it is essential for us to remain vigilant and monitor developments. There may be reasons to consider adjusting the instructions for assignments in the future.
"Aha Experiences" during the course of the course	It was a really good idea to have the students present their assignments using slides.
Expressions of how the Canvas-page and other administrative processes been like	As stated earlier, students expressed dissatisfaction with the timeframe between the seminar and the grading (along with comments). Additionally, there was some confusion regarding the instructions for one of the assignments.
Other:	I believe it's worth discussing the level of collaboration desirable between this course and "Europe in the World"—whether we aim for more or less integration.

* The Course reporting aims at responsiveness to the students' views, quality assurance of the business as well as subject and educational development. The report should have a forward-looking focus, based on the reflector's and visions of the course manager, and based on a compilation of impressions derived from the following amounts of material: comments by students individually or in groups; teacher's, study administrator and student counselor's views and impressions from the students; miter mining evaluation and the results from the course evaluation poll.
