Impressions of course execution: general and specific	This is a well-established course with a clear structure focused on three overarching themes: security, trade and migration. It offers research-led teaching with ample opportunity for students to hone the skills of academic writing as well as oral presentations. While it was a large class of students to manage this year, the execution of the course went smoothly overall.
Impressions of the students' general views on the course	This course normally has very high and favorable ratings by students. However, the response-rate this year was very low (21%) which means it needs to be interpreted with caution. 40% rated the course very/rather good which is lower than previous years.
Impressions of the students' specific views on the course	The views of students are mixed. There are very positive comments about individual teachers and the contents of lectures, while some students think lectures need to be more streamlined and linked more directly to the writing assignments on the course. There is also criticism of the final research paper which some students found too demanding. However, it should be noted that about half of the students received top grades on this assignment which is higher than previous years.
Ideas about potential changes for the next time the course is given	Next time the course is running, the course convenor will inform seminar teachers that instructions in the three themed seminars need to be more streamlined with each other and keep to a similar format with clear links to the literature that needs to be engaged with for the research paper. The format for feedback on the final research essay could be reconsidered with a shorter synopsis to be discussed earlier on the course to give more time before the final submission deadline.
Ideas for long-term and / or more extensive changes	N/A
"Aha Experiences" during the course of the course
